He found him opposite Fitzgibbons' grocery, the spot where the bloody rencontre took place. He went up to McDowell and asked him why he had whipped his wife. McDowell said that his own wife had been whipped by Whately's, whereupon Whately went up to him and called him the usual appropriate name for such an occasion. McDowell remarked, "If you want to whip me I am right here," and proceeded to pull off what he considered his coat. The next proceeding was on the part of Whately, who stepped up to McDowell and drew the forefunger of the left hand across McDowell's throat in razor-like style, and Dowell's throat in razor-like style, and made some remark which none of the wit-nesses could catch. McDowell at the same time gave him a belt in the side of the face that sent him reeling to the rear. Whately then boldly advanced with a little pocket knife open in his right hand, and out Mc-Bowell in the left cheek with it. He Bowell in the left cheek with it. He advanced a second time and inflicted another cut on the same side of the face, but lower down. The knife in this case seems to have slipped off the jaw tone and down the neck, severing the jugular antery, though this is not certain. The next stab was over the heart. This is supposed to have entered the heart. The knife made a perfect horizontal cut. Either of the two last stabs, it is thought, would have caused death. McDowell fell dead on the spot.
